(a work photo) From that day on I decided that I would capture my family members; that is the reason I recommend to people "take pictures." for the memories and to be remembered by those we leave behind.

The Intimate World of Josef Sudek features 163 photographs made by Sudek between 1918 and 1976, most of them drawn from an extraordinary gift of over 1,700 prints made to the National Gallery by an anonymous donor in 2010. Several works by Sudek's contemporaries — among them Jaromír Funke, Jaroslav Rössler and Josef Ehm — have been added for the Ottawa presentation to give an indication of the rich artistic environment surrounding Sudek.

Anne Brigman (1869-1950)--a West Coast photographer, actress and poet--was one of the original members of the Photo-Secession. Because of Stieglitz's notoriously high standards and because of her distance from the other members in New York, it was a significant indicator of her artistic status to be asked to join the movement.

Declining vision led her to abandon professional freelance photography in 1930 although she continued photography through the 1940s. Her work evolved from a pure pictorial style to more of a straight photography approach, although she never really abandoned her original vision. Her later close-up photos of sandy beaches and vegetation are near-abstractions in black-and-white.
