American Government In Black And

Black Women Sterilized in North Carolina . Countless numbers of Americans who were poor, mentally ill, from minority backgrounds or otherwise regarded as "undesirable" were sterilized as the eugenics movement gained momentum in the United States. Early 20th century eugenicists believed that measures should be taken to prevent "undesirables" from reproducing so that problems such as poverty ...

Black neighborhoods were coded red in these maps, a practice that became known as "redlining." The logic was that using government-guaranteed funds to assist potential black homeowners was essentially too risky a bet to take. Future government loan programs during the pre-Civil Rights era adopted this reasoning.

The fact that most black homicides are committed by other black people, or that black police officers are statistically just as or more likely to use lethal force against a black person than a white officer , are derided as distracting from the important work of bringing justice and change to the country.

The Tuskegee Syphilis Study, also known as the Tuskegee Syphilis Experiment, Tuskegee Study of Untreated Syphilis in the African American Male, U.S. Public Health Service Syphilis Study at Tuskegee, or Tuskegee Experiment, was a clinical study conducted between 1932 and 1972 by the United States Public Health Service and the Centers For Disease Control.

The disproportionate vulnerability of African American employees to the impacts of government budget cuts helps explain why black workers have fared so much worse than other slices of the population since the recession's end. In May, the unemployment rate among black Americans reached 16.2 percent, up from 15.5 percent a year earlier.
