Barkers & Bones: Portrait of an Undercover Narc: Ribera ...

Barker herself paints mostly women, and their feelings are strong but uncertain, too. A single red rose, the sole exception to women and landscapes, could stand for withering and isolation or an offering of love. Barker is hardly a folk artist, but she does see art as therapy, and past self-taught artists have descended into madness.

Other versions connect Raw Head and Bloody Bones to the Gullah tradition of the "haint," a general term for any kind of restless spirit that prowls at night (and comes looking for bad children). If you are familiar with Southern folklore, you know that many of the region's stories draw from African tales retold by enslaved people to whites over the 250 years before the Civil War.
