Disenchantment, rationality and the modernity of Max Weber. Following Aristotle's distinction between theoretical and practical rationality, Max Weber holds that beliefs about the world and actions within the world must follow procedures consistently and be appropriately formed if they are to count as rational. Here, I argue that Weber's account of theoretical and practical rationality, as disclosed through his conception of the disenchantment of the world, displays a confessional ...

In sociology, rationalization (or rationalisation) is the replacement of traditions, values, and emotions as motivators for behavior in society with concepts based on rationality and reason. For example, the implementation of bureaucracies in government is a kind of rationalization, as is the construction of high-efficiency living spaces in architecture and urban planning.

What Weber's diagnosis of modernity shows us is that even rationality has seeds of irrationality in it - and that truly, we cannot have one without the other. The greater the rationality of the social structure and organization of a society, the greater the irrationality, which exists underneath the surface and grows and festers.
