The Red House Mystery by A.A. Milne. Most of us know A.A. Milne as the creator of the lovable Winnie the Pooh, but this one-off country house crime caper could have been written especially for fans of Gosford Park or Downton Abbey. The black sheep of the family returns only to be found shot dead in a locked study.

Altman's star-studded send up of the classic murder mystery features a group the British upper class who spend the weekend at Gosford Park, a country home, for a hunting holiday during the 1930s. After an unpleasant weekend, the owner of the house Sir William, played by Michael Gambon, is killed and everyone in the house is a suspect with motive.

Mystery in White was not the first festive novel of crime's "Golden Age," but it is prototypical of the genre of Christmas mysteries—an English country house isolated in a snowdrift, a group of people all heading home, or to relatives, for the Christmas holidays, a log fire for everyone to gather round, resentments seething just below the surface of civility, murder, and then a self-appointed detective who is rarely an official policeman.

Authentic English country house style can be hard to replicate. More often than not, the best examples have derived their look from generations of inhabitants collecting objects and carefully modifying the existing décor. It is a look that manages to be both timeless and liveable, grand but infinitely comfortable.
