Falling action is what happens near the end of a story after the climax and resolution of the major conflict. The majority of literary and dramatic works (stories, novels, plays, movies) are built on action—characters doing things, typically pursuing things they want. The climax (the most intense part of the story, often a turning point or a conclusion to the conflict) is preceded by rising action and followed by falling action.

Rising action is one of the most important elements of a story. Once you have revealed the main conflict, it's time to build up the tension. In order for readers to cheer your protagonist on to victory, they must know what they're up against, and all the things they need to do to overcome those challenges. Rising action occurs as every step supposedly brings the protagonist closer to their goal, but instead, problem after problem arises to challenge them.
