Five Kinds of Silence (1997), originally written for radio, begins with Billy - later revealed as a man who brutally abuses both his wife and two daughters - describing a dream in which, he claims, he was able to smell his surroundings. Five Kinds of Silence begins with a murder, but this is no whodunit, for we see the killers and the killing. But Five Kinds of Silence (or Kind of Silence, as the programme appears to have it) is still a very potent analysis of a family driven to murder by years of abuse at the hands of a sadistic bully of a husband and father, Billy, played with terrifying ferocity by Zach Lee. Its roots in radio are very apparent in its short, interconnecting scenes, jumping back and forth in time, as the characters deliver contrasting soliloquies.
