Joe Studwell's How Asia Works is fascinating reading. It talks about how Korea, Japan and China have grown while their counterparts haven't. Studwell highlights a number of factors that contribute to economic growth: With an agrarian economy, a market garden approach to agriculture rather than farming at scale delivers the best results.

In "How Asia Works", Joe Studwell tells us how this seeming miracle was made possible: a three-step prescription of land reform, export-focused industrial policy, and financial repression. Japan, South Korea, Taiwan, and (most recently) mainland China have grown rich by following this formula; by ignoring it, Finances: Studwell shows that rapidly developing countries usually give lip service to free-market principles while actually keeping their financial institutions "on a short leash." In other words, they enact policies to protect themselves against the shocks and whiplash of global-capital flows, and they make sure their financial institutions serve the country's long-term development ends rather than the short-term interests of financiers.

Hi Joe, I found How Asia Works to be a fascinating thesis. As a young adult living in an affluent western society, (Australia) I am particularly interested in your explanation of land reform as a catalyst for development. It appears that the initial impetus for post-WWII land reform came from the United States rather than Japan, Taiwan etc.

Studwell shows how they largely got it right, by copying the 19th Century Prussian model. (In China and North Korea the agricultural boom ended when the Communists collectivised the farms.) In South East Asia land reform never took place, probably because events were not dramatic enough to force it to happen.
