correct Do you know why she is doing that? wrong Do you know why is she doing that? But isn't word order different in questions? Yes, but the question is "Do you know ...?". The part "why she did it" is a subordinate clause, no matter what comes before it. People tend to make mistakes especially after "who" and "what":

'I Know Where She Is' by S. B. Caves is a mystery/thriller novel. Autumn has been missing for 10 year after going missing when out one day with her Mum, Francine. On the 10th anniversary of her disappearance Francine receives a hand written note. All that is on the note are the words, 'I know where she is'.

"Do you know where she lives?" is correct English. "Where does she live?" is also right. In the first case, the question is directed at someone. The second case, it is just a question (not directed at anyone in particular).

Joan Webster (Wendy Hiller) is a young middle-class Englishwoman with an ambitious, independent spirit. She knows where she's going, or at least she thinks she does. She travels from her home in Manchester to the Hebrides to marry Sir Robert Bellinger, a wealthy, much older industrialist, on the (fictitious) Isle of Kiloran.
