International law and EU law are a lot alike. EU law is binding between all European Union member states. EU law is superior to national law, and thus, national law has to be changed sometimes when there is a new EU law. When EU law and national law are contradicting each other, EU law 'wins'. International law is not binding on every state.

About International and European Criminal Law. In the wake of increasing globalisation, criminal law has become an internationalised subject. This revised and updated second edition highlights the most important aspects of European and international criminal law in order to provide the reader with a comprehensive, concise and solid introduction to this modern field of law.

The field of International and European Criminal Law is under continuous development; a development not only facilitated by the extensive jurisprudence of European and international (criminal) courts and tribunals, but also growing efforts of conceptualisation in international legal scholarship.

Not only are their growing roles reshaping the governance of criminal law and justice, but these bodies are themselves becoming a target of offending behaviour. The European Journal of Crime, Criminal Law and Criminal Justice provides a forum for public debate on these European issues. It seeks not only to bridge the gap between European players and European states, but also to afford space for a non-European view on developments in these fields.

International and European Criminal Law - Inhaltsverzeichnis

Although EU law may be regarded as a specific form of international law, the main body of EU law has some particular features which usually do not appear in international law: in particular, citizens can invoke rights guaranteed by EU law before courts in the EU Member States, whereas international law usually needs to be transposed into national law before citizens can plead it. Also, EU law often prevails over the law of the EU Member States.
