These are not facts that business schools typically expose their students to. But in Investing: The Last Liberal Art, Robert Hagstrom maintains that the knowledge conveyed in a liberal arts curriculum begets wide understanding that improves investment skills. Hagstrom’s success in the profession — he is senior vice president and portfolio manager at Legg Mason Capital Management — makes his opinion on the subject worth considering.

After reading this book, it becomes clear that although the market is far from efficient, value investing— or determining the true intrinsic value of a company — is far harder than must pundits...
