The person who goes up to the bird should be someone he knows. A stranger may frighten him and cause him to fly to another tree. If you have other birds, you can try setting them outside in a secure cage with a bowl of food nearby. Sometimes this familiar sight (and squawking) will attract your bird and give him the courage to come out the tree.

But, if the bird vocalizes, you will be able to find its location by listening. It will almost always make noises that can be heard, giving direction to look in. Taking another bird out to the area may also help, especially if the other bird is a noisy friend of the lost bird or a mate or cage partner.

What To Do If Your Bird Is Lost

If the bird is a fledgling baby bird and is in the open, Chrans says you can gently nudge it toward a nearby area with hiding places, like bushes or shrubs, but no farther than an 8-foot radius from where it starts. For a nestling, Chrans suggests looking very hard for its nest.
