After reading Will's intriguing review of Lit: A Memoir, I decided it was time to explore Mary Karr's work, so I went to the library and borrowed The Liars' Club. Written in 1995, this memoir explores the author's dysfunctional childhood in sweltering and swampy Leechfield, Texas.

— Mary Karr, The Liars' Club “The week the local paper carried a story about the boy’s incarceration and lobotomy in the state hospital at Rusk, the guys at the refinery pitched the kid’s daddy a party complete with balloons and noisemakers.” — Mary Karr, The Liars' Club

The Liars' Club is meant to detail just a slice of young Mary's unconventional and sometimes horrific upbringing. That's why it seems a bit out of place when, in the last few chapters, the book skips ahead nearly twenty years to when Mary is a young woman and her father is dying.
