Give the people tools to make the news, We the Media asserts, and they will. Journalism in the 21st century will be fundamentally different from the Big Media that prevails today. We the Media casts light on the future of journalism, and invites us all to be part of it.

Continuing our look at 21st Century Journalism, I took note that all of the articles I read in the New York Times referred to the 10-person social distancing limit as part of "the White House Guidelines," except one. Some even falsely attributed the 10-person limit to the Centers for Disease Control.

CITIZEN JOURNALISM AND WEBLOGS

Blogs and Journalism. Weblogs, more commonly called blogs, became an important source of commentary, views and information in the early years of the 21st century. By 2010, statistics showed that nearly 3.5 million people read blogs every day. The majority of blogs focus on subjects of personal interest, but many professional journalists have their own blogs, in which to keep the public up to date with news, analyses and investigations.

"Weblogs expand the media universe. They are a media life-form that is native to the Web, and they add something new to our mix, something valuable, something that couldn't have existed before the Web. It should be obvious that weblogs aren't competing with the work of the professional journalism establishment, but rather complementing it. If the pros are criticized as being cautious, impersonal, corporate and herdlike, the bloggers are the opposite in, well, almost every respect: They're ...
