1. Writing is reading. The most obvious, and least sexy, tip is that to engage deeply with creative non-fiction you have to read as many books in this genre as you can. Of course every writer knows, or at least so I hope, that reading for writers is as important as the writing itself.

Tutor Tips: Creative Writing

Much like fiction writers are encouraged to come up with an "inciting incident" for their characters, the inciting incident in your creative nonfiction is the moment that forces you personally to take some kind of action and, as a result, changes you in some way. Without conflict and tension, this change can't really occur.

Read shorter pieces of writing at least two times, once to get the flavor and another time focusing on the details. If possible, make a copy of the poem or story, so that your initial musings don't have to be turned over the writer. Avoid reading the work for the first time immediately before the meeting.

Dialogue, characterization and description might be important tools of fiction writing, but that doesn't mean they also can't be used to create dynamic true stories. Narrative nonfiction brings real-life stories, such as personal experiences and historic events, to life using the techniques of fiction writing.

In this article, I will list my five rules for using creative techniques in historical non-fiction. #1 Never contradict fact. The golden rule is that a fictional element is always understudy to truth, used only when there are gaps in the historical record and a particular fact is unknown or open to interpretation. Creative non-fiction always hugs facts and never lets go.
